Like Martin Luther King Jr. once spoke, I have a dream. I have a dream that all of our fallen veterans will be remembered, honored; and celebrated. Unfortunately, there just isn't enough days in the year to honor them all with their own day. Luckily for us though, we have memorial day, a day to honor every veteran who ever died at war. Whether family or friend, or someone you read a story about. Whether a fighting soldier or a drummer boy. They are all to be remembered on memorial day. Even if they were a simple military chef who died when their camp was bombed, they are still to be remembered on memorial day. Everyone who died at war is a hero in one way or another. They all died fighting for our country. Whether they were healing, praying, cooking, driving, flying, or in battle, they were still fighting for our country. In the end they died fighting for our country. If that doesn't make you a hero I don't know what does. Each and every one of them made a sacrifice, the ultimate sacrifice, for our country. We should all be grateful for them, because without them we might not have the country we have today. When many people think of a fallen war hero, they might think of someone who died after pulling a grenade under themselves. Never, do most think about those who died when they were attacked delivering supplies, or doctors who died of exhaustion after saving soldiers day and night for weeks straight. Today and everyday from now we need to remember everyones story, whether heroic, horrific, or tragic. We need to remember every veteran who died during war. They are all heroes, in one way or another. They all deserve our respect and honor for their sacrifices. We need to remember them all.
